Translation, Theatre and Identity An Effect-Influence Relationship

April 29th - 30th, 2019

Call for Papers

The art of theatre is based on the conversion of a written literary text into theatrical scenes presented in front of an audience. Theatre would then be a crossing point between the text, the actor and the spectator. Yet the text contains linguistic and cultural expressions related to its characters and their religious, cultural and political environment, etc. This constitutes the environment of the text as well as its spatial-temporal framework. As for the actor, he embodies the roles of the characters of the work from paper to the scene, which implies the transfer of language and cultural elements of the theatrical text, while the audience is central to the theatre work.

Hence, theatre is closely related to both the cultural and identity components of the spectator to the extent that it develops in him a rational mobility and a dialogue between him and the other, notably if the theatre text belongs to a different cultural environment. In an extrapolation of the history of world theatre, it seems to us that his masterpieces were never taken exclusively by a specific country, but a quality text often exceeds the borders of its producer and the original space of his presentation worldwide. Thus, translation has always been and still is the bridge through which the theatrical texts pass from one shore to another and from a culture to a different one. It is the case of Shakespeare's plays and others.

The theatre is a setting that carries a diversity of thoughts and cultures. Meanwhile, translation often performs the role of the mediator to allow the transition between the first language of the text and the target one. Thus, this fact demonstrates an effect/ influence relationship governing the ties between translation, theatre and identity.

Objectives

- Reviewing the literature of translation, theatre and identity and discussing the main issues tackled in these areas.
- Shedding light on the status of translation and theatre.
- Identifying the problems and challenges defeating translation and theatre.

- Enriching the debate on how to support translation, theatre and translators of other disciplines and develop the culture of translation within the individual.
- Recommending strategies for the promotion of translation and theatre.
